Garrison Keillor has no love for our Nobel laureate.

Keillor gets no thrill from Dylan

In his latest book, Garrison Keillor has plenty of praise for poet Robert Bly, the late writer Bill Holm and even Prince. But he's less than kind to another fellow Minnesotan. "Now and then people ask me why we didn't have Dylan on the show," the former host of "A Prairie Home Companion" writes in "Living With Limericks," where he self-published last week. "Because I don't care to be associated with him, that's why. I think that 'My Back Pages' is one of the worst songs ever written. I could name others. It's no wonder he took a pseudonym, so as to avoid bringing shame on the Zimmerman family." Because it's a book of limericks, Keillor can't resist sharing one he penned in "honor" of the Nobel Prize winner:

*There is a songwriter named Bob / Who makes some people's hearts throb.
They find a thrill in / Listening to Dylan / And for me it's more like a job.*

It's safe to assume Keillor won't cover any Dylan tunes when he reunites with some "Prairie Home" companions Nov. 30 for a Christmas show at the Pantages Theatre. NEAL JUSTIN
